PJ

Deltek Defect Tracking Number:

905938

Issues Resolved:

Description: An issue on Costpoint stored procedures occurred when installing a new MS SQL server. Collation can be set at the server level and overridden at the database level. When the server level was set at non-binary and the database level was set at binary, no issue was encountered. However, when the server level was set at binary and the database level was also set at binary, some Costpoint stored procedures would not compile. These stored procedures contain variables declared with a case different from where it is used (that is, the stored procedure code is now case-sensitive and requires exact case match for variable declaration and usage).

Customers Impacted: This defect affects you if you are creating a new Costpoint database with the SQL server set to binary.

Workaround Before Fix: Set the SQL server setting to non-binary collation.

Additional Notes: It is rare practice that the server level is set at binary. It does not happen frequently, but the severity is fatal when it happens. You can do the following to check server collation:

- To check the default server collation of a SQL server installation, run the following SQL query: sp_helpsort.
- To check the collation of a particular database, right-click on the database in SQL Server Enterprise Manager (2000 or older) or Management Studio (2005 or later), and click Properties. The collation will be displayed in the Collation Name field.
